PRAISE FOR A NEW SENATOR

Oklahoma's Senior Senator Displays Charisma in Debate on Noted Aldrich Financial Bill

In the wake of the Oklahoma delegations' recent victory in Congress, a recent Washington special has the following concerning the new senator from the 40th state:

"Senator Robert L. Owen, were he a republican, would be the outsider in the Senate, but the minority instead of the majority, the minority party instead of the majority party, and he is an exceptional first member of the Senate. He is not a naive politician, but a man of common sense and of common sense, who is a master of the subject, who is a master of the subject, and who is a master of the English language. He is one of the men who have the power to make good of himself in a running debate. In fact, he is the only one of his kind. He is a master of the subject, and he is a master of the English language."

The New York Times of Sunday, March 1, also says:

"Latham Owen, who has been in the Senate for two years, is a man of natural ability, who has the power to make good of himself in a running debate. He is a master of the subject, and he is a master of the English language. He is one of the men who have the power to make good of himself in a running debate. In fact, he is the only one of his kind. He is a master of the subject, and he is a master of the English language."

But there were no speeches by Mr. Owen.

"He is the only one of his kind. He is a master of the subject, and he is a master of the English language. He is one of the men who have the power to make good of himself in a running debate. In fact, he is the only one of his kind. He is a master of the subject, and he is a master of the English language."

Bull for the south-west!"
