The Tulsa Race Massacre

Inquiry Design Model (IDM) Blueprint™

Prior to implementing this lesson plan and its primary sources, review “Selecting Primary Sources: Criteria for Classroom Use” to determine if these selections are appropriate for your classroom. Many sources are included so that instructors may select based on their knowledge of their students.

Supporting Question 1

How could anyone do that?

Formative Performance Task

This task allows students to examine the causes of the Tulsa Race Massacre and assess whether they were catalysts or causes. It is acceptable if there is disagreement on the answers. The focus of the task is for students to consider, critically, the contributing factors.

Students will read the “Causes and Catalysts” section of the source and complete the graphic organizer. They may work individually or in small groups. The teacher will then facilitate a discussion to see what agreement exists in the students’ thinking.

Supporting Question 2

What happened to the people of Greenwood and the people who did this?

Formative Performance Task

This task allows students to explore their expectations about justice and race during this time.

Students will read “The Massacre” and, before they read “Aftermath” and “Controversies” sections, they will make predictions about the impacts of the massacre using the graphic organizer. The teacher may choose to conduct a brief discussion and create a class list of predictions. Then, students will read “Aftermath” and “Controversies.” They will see how closely their guesses aligned with the historical record. Again, the teacher may choose to conduct a discussion to process the outcomes of the massacre.

Summative Performance Task

Argument

Students will create an instructional material (poster, student reading, visual or recorded presentation) on the Tulsa Race Massacre. The rubric at the end of this plan may be used to assess the product but it is recommended teacher review the rubric expectations to students before beginning the project.

Extension

Research and respond: Does this hundred-year-old event influence race relations today?

Taking Informed Action

Students can tour the John Hope Franklin Reconciliation Park and discuss how this impacts the communities affected by the Tulsa Race Massacre. http://www.panowalks.com/embed/7izaQPRaovbF5jliZm8KtlyrzykzD4/

Section 1: Contributing factors of the Tulsa Race Massacre

A contributing factor is something that played a role in something else occurring. There are different kinds of contributing factors. A cause is a reason why something happened. A catalyst is a reason why something happened when, where, and how it did.

For example, in World War I, an outdated balance of power system was a major cause.

The catalyst for World War I (why it happened when it did) was the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand.

The Voting Rights Act became law because many states placed long-standing barriers in the path of African-American voters. (Major Cause)

A primary catalyst for the passage of the Voting Rights Act was the violent attacks on protestors for voting rights in the Selma campaign.

A cause will be a factor in an event regardless of when, where, or how it happened. A catalyst will be a factor in that specific incident.

For example, the institution and expansion of slavery would be the major cause of the Civil War. This would be true even if the Civil War happened at a different time or with a different division of states or if had been fought with bows and arrows. The election of Abraham Lincoln was a catalyst in that it contributed to the outbreak of the war in 1861.

As you learn about the Tulsa Race Massacre, record the different contributing factors. Determine whether the factor was a cause (a reason why something happened) or a catalyst (something happening in a specific place, way, or time). Be prepared to justify your answer!
